Early Life

Betsy Johnson was born in Pennsylvania in 1756. Her family moved to Kentucky in 1775, and they settled at Bryan Station, a frontier outpost near Lexington.

Betsy was a skilled frontierswoman. She was an expert shot and could handle a tomahawk with ease. She was also a strong and courageous woman, and she was not afraid to stand up to danger.

The Siege of Bryan Station

In August 1782, Bryan Station was attacked by a large force of Native Americans and British loyalists. The station was defended by a small garrison of Kentucky militiamen, and Betsy Johnson played a vital role in the defense.

Betsy fought alongside the men, loading and firing muskets. She also helped to care for the wounded and encourage the other defenders.

The siege lasted for several days, and the defenders were outnumbered and outgunned. But they fought bravely, and they refused to give up. Betsy Johnson was a constant source of inspiration to the other defenders, and she helped to keep their spirits up.

Eventually, the siege was lifted, and the defenders of Bryan Station were victorious. Betsy Johnson was hailed as a hero, and she was credited with playing a major role in the victory.

Later Life

After the war, Betsy Johnson married a fellow frontiersman named John Todd. They had several children, and they lived a long and happy life together.

Betsy Johnson died in 1836. She is buried in Bryan Station Cemetery, and her grave is a popular tourist attraction.
